

Ewa Juskiewicz 'Locks with Leaves and Swelling Buds'

Collateral Event of the 60th International Art Exhibition – La Biennale di Venezia

Apr 20 — Sep 1, 2024 | Venice

Fundación Almine y Bernard Ruiz-Picasso is pleased to present the solo exhibition Ewa Juskiewicz: Locks with Leaves and Swelling Buds curated by Guillermo Solana.

In the world of film and television, a creation that can be summed up in few words is called “high-concept”. One may describe Ewa Juskiewicz's paintings as portraits of faceless women, portraits of historic women, stripped of their faces, or reinterpretations of historic female portraits, their faces covered by hair, plants, or draperies. While these formulas are correct, they do not come close to suggesting the scope and complexity of her work.

For more than a decade, Juskiewicz has created paintings based on portraits of women by European artists, especially those from the 18th and 19th centuries. *I started this series of paintings in 2011, she says, but before then I had already experimented and subjected the traditional portrait to various deformations. I had examined where the boundaries of the portrait were and what effects I could achieve by means of deformation and distortion.*¹ In 2010, Juskiewicz painted a series of masked characters: a woman in a striped sweater with a ruffled collar and bowtie, wearing a sinister rabbit mask; another woman, dressed in a shirt reminiscent of seventeenth-century Dutch portraits, with a lion mask; a girl in a red velvet dress and white apron, her face covered like a Mexican wrestler. In all these cases, the markedly feminine clothing contrasted with the violence suggested by the mask.

Pro-facility Masks

These early masks replaced a natural face with an artificial one, but they were not intended to challenge the dominant position of the face in our visual environment. They were examples of what I call the pro-facility mask. Deleuze and Guattari, in their classic book A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia (1980), characterized "the abstract machine of facility" as a total cultural and communicative grammar:

*We have made some progress toward answering the question of what triggers the abstract machine of facility, for it is not in operation all the time or in just any social formation. Certain social formations need face, and also landscape. There is a whole history behind it. At very different dates, there occurred a generalized collapse of all of the heterogeneous, polyvocal, primitive semiotics in favor of a semiotic of significance and subjectification.*²

In tribal societies, according to Deleuze and Guattari, the mask ensured the integration of the head into the body as a whole; under the new regime, the mask executes the symbolic separation of the face from the rest of the body. Thus begins the era of facility with its successive avatars: the emperor's head, Christ the Pantocrator, the Renaissance portrait, the movie star close-up, the TV talking head.

For all its breaks from tradition, avant-garde art rarely questioned this schema. From the post-Impressionist pioneers, such as Cézanne and Van Gogh to the Fauves, the German Expressionists, and the Cubists, advanced artists adopted the human countenance as the central object of their experimentations and subjected it to innumerable transformations, but always retaining the dominance of faciality. Even the featureless mannequins of Giorgio de Chirico and the figures of Malevich offer us their blank heads, onto which we project a face. The twentieth century artist who most radically changed the representation of the human face, Pablo Picasso, was, at the same time, the one artist who most decisively confirmed the hegemony of faciality.

Anti-faciality or Camouflage Masks

The series of female characters painted by Ewa Juszkiewicz in 2010 includes a young woman dressed in a white pleated skirt and blue blouse with white polka dots. We cannot see her face, hidden by her own hair, gathered in two pigtailed. Is she facing us, with her head bent down, or are we looking at her head from behind? The hair is an improvised mask, but a mask that does not offer us, over the face it hides, the image of another face or facial scheme. In 2012, Juszkiewicz painted a version of Élisabeth Vigée Le Brun's Self-Portrait in a Straw Hat (1782) in which, instead of a face, we see carefully combed hair, divided by a vertical parting. This is already a consummate example of Juszkiewicz's characteristic invention, the anti-faciality mask. The pro-faciality mask hid one face and proposed another, symbolic or fantastic, animal or supernatural. The anti-faciality mask hides the first face and prevents the appearance of a second one, blocking the reproduction of faciality. I also call it 'camouflage mask' because it can mimic anything, except a face.

For some time, Juszkiewicz occasionally relapsed into the pro-faciality mask, for instance when she resorted to Native American Northwest Coast masks to transform Albrecht Dürer's Portrait of His Mother (2012) or Vigée-Lebrun's Self-Portrait at the Easel (2013). In Sisters (2014), one of her most effective and most sinister compositions, the heads of the three women in a portrait by Anton Graff are replaced by three giant beetles, suggesting masks from some tribal culture.

By 2013-2014, the dominance of the anti-faciality mask was consolidated in Juszkiewicz's work. Any object capable of replacing a head or any material capable of enveloping it would be used: hypertrophied mushrooms, a bouquet of flowers, a tangle of branches and leaves, a combed or braided head of hair, a bandage made of luxurious fabrics.... When these objects and materials appear in the place of the face, the viewer looks for signs of an eye, nose, mouth, for signs of a facial outline; sometimes, but for an instant, they may think they have found them, but their reading is immediately frustrated. The anti-faciality mask actively resists our desire to decipher a face in it. In Juszkiewicz's painting, Deleuze and Guattari's dream of escaping the long cultural hegemony of faciality seems at last realized.

Historical Portraits

Juszkiewicz's series of versions of historical portraits participates in a strategy of appropriation that was established by Pop Art and became widespread in the 1980s. Juszkiewicz cites Cindy Sherman's and her "History Portraits" series as a precedent for her own work. But she does not conceive of appropriation as a satirical parody of the original. Her work is based on a genuine admiration for the painters she chooses, and an eagerness to rescue the painting of the past and bring it back to life:

*For me, this activity is a symbolic attempt of forging a relationship with a painter from the past. In this way, I try to establish a dialogue with him and try to share the common experience which is characteristic of creative work. It is a little bit like a séance — a painterly attempt to look for connections, to recall the presence of the painter from the past and to say just that little bit more — maybe what has been hidden under the painting for all those years?*³

In her versions of old portraits, Juskiewicz cultivates a traditional pictorial craft, painting in layers, with many glazes, following the brushstrokes of the original work. But her technical virtuosity would be useless if it were not at the service of a transgressive project. By covering the face of historical portraits, Juskiewicz challenges the very essence of this genre: she destroys the portrait as such. Her paintings based on old portraits are no longer portraits of anyone in particular, but representations of the condition of women under patriarchy. And, as she has pointed out, at the heart of the intervened portrait she drives the stake of another genre: the still life, to which belong the fabrics, flowers, fruits, and other objects she uses as masks, subverting the traditional hierarchy of genres and the culture/nature dichotomy. Juskiewicz's painting style differs slightly from the inspiration she seeks in the originals: almost all her versions have a larger (sometimes much larger) format than the originals, and a palette that is more vivid, and saturated, with a more luminous effect. Her pictorial treatment is unmistakably contemporary.

Surrealist Precedents

Juskiewicz's work certainly ties in with Surrealist precedents. For example, her 2017 collage cycle, which combines black-and-white reproductions of women's portraits with cutouts from old natural history albums, is consciously in the wake of Max Ernst's collage novels. But if Ernst's hybrid characters, with their bird, lion, or insect heads, always remained in the realm of the pro-facility mask, Juskiewicz ventures to replace the human head with a mushroom, rose, orchid, butterfly wings, coral, or cloud. Juskiewicz has painted an almost literal version of Magritte's The Collective Invention (1935) that would fall into the catalog of pro-facility masks, because the fish has eyes and a mouth and even an expression of stupor. But most of her work falls under the guise of a painting by Salvador Dalí, Woman with Head of Roses (1935), inspired by René Crevel's verses: *A ball of flowers will serve for her head. Her brain is rucked, and, at the same time, a bouquet.*⁴ Unlike Giuseppe Arcimboldo, who adjusted his flowers or fruits to simulate a face, Dalí creates one of the first strictly anti-facility masks, on the threshold of a new era of the visible: *When the face is effaced, when the facility traits disappear," Deleuze and Guattari claimed, "we can be sure that we have entered another regime, other zones infinitely muter and more imperceptible where subterranean becomings-animal occur, becomings-molecular, nocturnal deterritorializations overspilling the limits of the signifying system.*⁵

A Feminist Détournement

One of the most comprehensive statements behind Ewa Juskiewicz's intentions can be found in a 2020 interview:

*By deconstructing the portraits, I want to draw attention to the schematic and conservative way in which many of them are depicted. After all, most of the portraits we know of from art history embody the conventions that have been imposed on women. By reinterpreting their images, I want to revive history and overturn the aesthetic canons of a given period. This is my protest against the stereotypical perception of femininity. By substituting certain canons, I want to show the individual identity of women, their complexity and underline their uniqueness.*⁶

One could argue that, in the old portraits of women, the norms and ideals of decorum (and also of fashion) are reflected above all in their dress and accessories, in their bodies' posture, and in the setting of the portrait, while the face would be a place safe from such conventions, and even the last redoubt of individual personality. By covering the face, Juskiewicz removes this organ of subjective expression, taking to the extreme the depersonalization and reification of the model.

Such an interpretation idealizes and fetishizes the face in historical female portraits as the site of authenticity, when actually it is but another mask. Like the dress or posture, even more so, the female face is subjected to the canons of beauty and the codes of expression of the time. A slight inclination of the head can suggest shyness, on the contrary, a restrained coquetry; a pout of the lips indicates the desire to please; a look can be candid, tender, or submissive, and all these features reflect the limited variety of accepted social roles of the woman as daughter, mother, fiancée, or wife: always in relation to the male. When Juskiewicz covers the face of the old portraits, she cancels those signs and roles and the female figures are liberated, emancipated from the patriarchal gaze.

The Masquerade of Feminity

The essay "Womanliness as a masquerade" is a classic title by psychoanalyst Joan Riviere, published in 1929. Riviere studied the cases of women who hid their knowledge and abilities and adopted behaviors marked as feminine in order to prevent men from feeling threatened. The mask of femininity is a defensive performance:

Womanliness therefore could be assumed and worn as a mask, both to hide the possession of masculinity and to avert the reprisals expected if she was found to possess it — much as a thief will turn out his pockets and ask to be searched to prove that he has not the stolen goods. The reader may now ask how I define womanliness or where I draw the line between genuine womanliness and the 'masquerade'. My suggestion is not, however, that there is any such difference; whether radical or superficial, they are the same thing.⁷

Such a conclusion anticipates by more than half a century Judith Butler and her theory of gender as performance.

Costume in fashion has always been an important part of this 'masquerade'. The portraits Juskiewicz chooses as her starting point are often filled with silks and velvets, sumptuous fabrics, with multiple folds and ribbons and bows. Fashion plays a role here, again, that is essentially ambiguous, at once repressive and expressive depersonalizing and objectifying women:

I often got the impression that they were trapped in corsets, crinolines, layers of petticoats constraining their movements, somehow imposing their presence on them in the world. Fashion in the past is visually attractive and fascinating to us today but, upon deeper reflection, we can conclude that its hidden function is a kind of oppression and constraint. There is not much room for individuality or otherness. What is significant is that this also applies to contemporary canons of beauty and ideals of the female body. I think it is a bit like making fun of history. We consider ourselves to be more modern than our ancestors, but we actually squeeze ourselves into our own, modern 'corsets.' My painting is the result of a little bit of contrariness; a desire to break free from the norms imposed on us by our fashion and culture.⁸

On the other hand, fashion can be transgressive and liberating. Among contemporary fashion creators, Juskiewicz is interested in figures such as Rei Kawakubo, Martin Margiela, Alexander McQueen, and Iris van Herpen; radical designers proposing alternative visions of the human body, far removed from the normative ones.⁹ One effect of "the abstract machine of faciality" was the strict separation of the face from the rest of the body. Juskiewicz's wrappings cancel this separation, covering not just the face but all of the head and sometimes part of the torso too, thus modifying the perception of the female body as a whole.

Hair and Foliage

Each one of the elements used by Juskiewicz presents a double side: on the one hand, it can be seen as a stereotypical characterization of femininity within a patriarchal culture, on the other as a promise of emancipation. The materials, fabrics, hair, plants, can be considered as an embodiment of the ornamental role of women and their identification with a subdued nature. But one can also interpret them as the hidden expressions of women's desire and sensuality buried beneath the corsets.

So, it is with hair, one of the key features of female identity throughout centuries of patriarchal culture, and a symbolic element for both male sexual anxiety and mythology of female sexual power. In Juskiewicz's work, hair is presented into two antithetical modes. From one perspective, there are heads of hair tightly combed, braided or curled, which are the antithesis of the openness of a face: something without eyes or mouth, incapable of speaking or looking back at us. Then there is tangled hair, interwoven with leaves and branches, enveloping the head as vegetation invades the ruins.

Lisa Small, senior curator of European Art at the Brooklyn Museum begins her brilliant essay on Juskiewicz's work evokes Daphne's metamorphosis.¹⁰ The transformation of the nymph's hair into leaves is rooted in the Greek word κόμη, which designates both the hair and foliage of trees. When Juskiewicz intertwines hair and plant fibers, a regression takes place, as if the hair is returning to its natural origin. And it is this regression that presents an ambiguous sense, seemingly endorsing the sexist cliché of women as pure nature and challenging the patriarchal regime with a desire capable of going wild. *By bringing together apparently incompatible worlds, I want to overthrow a well-known order and a free sensuality. My paintings are born from a deep desire to break existing patterns and to bring out emotions, feelings, and passions.*¹¹

— Guillermo Solana, Artistic Director at Thyssen-Bornemisza Museum

This exhibition is organized by FABA (Fundación Almine y Bernard Ruiz-Picasso) and supported by Almine Rech.

¹ Ewa Juskiewicz interviewed by Claire Selvin, "Painter Ewa Juskiewicz Wants to Shatter Conservative Ideas About Beauty," ArtNews, November 25, 2020, <https://www.artnews.com/art-news/artists/ewa-juskiewicz-gagosian-interview-1234577260/>.

² Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia, trans. Brian Massumi (Minneapolis and London: University of Minnesota Press, 1987), 180.

³ "Classical Female Portraiture and the Art of Constraint: An Interview with Ewa Juskiewicz," BerlinArtLink, Lucia Longhi, March 01, 2019, <https://www.berlinartlink.com/2019/03/01/classical-female-portraiture-and-the-art-of-constraint-an-interview-with-ewa-juskiewicz/>.

⁴ "Une boule de fleurs va lui servir de tête. Son cerveau est à la fois la ruche et le bouquet." René Crevel, "La grande mannequin cherche et trouve sa peau," Minotaure no. 5 (1934).

⁵ Deleuze and Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus, 587.

⁶ Ewa Juskiewicz interviewed by Bill Powers, "Free Sensuality: Ewa Juskiewicz," Muse (December 2020), https://gagosian.com/media/gallery/press/2020/Powers_Bill_Free_Sensuality_Ewa_Juskiewicz_Muse_December_2020.pdf.

⁷ Joan Riviere, "Womanliness as a masquerade" in Shelley Saguro, ed., Psychoanalysis and Woman: A Reader (New York: New York University Press, 2000), 73.

⁸ "Classical Female Portraiture and the Art of Constraint: An Interview with Ewa Juskiewicz," BerlinArtLink, Lucia Longhi, March 01, 2019, <https://www.berlinartlink.com/2019/03/01/classical-female-portraiture-and-the-art-of-constraint-an-interview-with-ewa-juskiewicz/>.

⁹ All of them have played with masks, from fencing masks to BDSM hoods, and sometimes even challenging the scheme of faciality.

¹⁰ Lisa Small, "Ewa Juskiewicz," Gagosian Quarterly, Winter 2020, <https://gagosian.com/quarterly/2020/11/09/essay-ewa-juskiewicz/>.

¹¹ Bill Powers, "Free Sensuality: Ewa Juskiewicz"